ABSTRACT

This document contains a bibliography of books, articles, and films which deal with the phenomenon of street children. The citations in this bibliography came from a literature search of several sources and from personal contacts with individuals who work with street children. Historical references, drawn primarily from North American and European sources, are included to provide some perspective and context for contemporary fieldworkers and researchers. This bibliography is intended as an experience-sharing resource for individuals who are working on behalf of street children and also as a resource for clinicians and academic researchers who are giving their attention to street children. Because of research conducted in Latin America, the bibliography contains references in both English and Spanish. A few references are included on street children in Asia. English language citations include 58 historical, 81 contemporary, and 7 literary references. Spanish and other language citations include 29 contemporary references and 1 literary reference. The bibliography concludes with a list of 11 references to films. (NB)

Introduction

The following selected bibliography was drawn from a literature search focused on the subject of so-called "street children". In recent years, the existence of street children has been recognized as a serious social problem in developing countries. It appears to have both historical and cross-cultural dimensions. However, most programs working with these children have existed in relative isolation and little, if any, of their experience was being shared or disseminated.

In 1982, The International Programme on Street Children and Street Youth began operation in Geneva, Switzerland. It was established in an attempt to help various programs working with street children around the world come to know of each others existence and share their acquired knowledge and expertise. The existing literature on street children is relatively sparse and what does exist is poorly indexed. There has been little formal research on the subject and virtually no prospective, longitudinal studies are available.

This literature search drew upon the following sources: Psychological Abstracts, Sociological Abstracts, Public Affairs Information Service, Magazine Index, National Newspaper Index, ERIC and Medline. In addition, many personal contacts were made with individuals (fieldworkers, clinicians, researchers) who have been or are currently involved in work with street children. The majority of references cited are from secondary sources. A significant number of the other citations remain unpublished.

As my own research was conducted in Latin America, this bibliography contains references in both English and Spanish. Though it includes a few references on the subject from Asia, I suspect that there are, in Asia and Africa, numerous secondary sources and unpublished manuscripts that do not appear in this bibliiography. The historical references, drawn primarily from North American and European sources, are included here to help provide some perspective and context for contemporary fieldworkers and researchers. Finally, street children have proven a compelling subject for a range of observers, thus this bibliography contains references to literary as well as visual (photographic and film) treatments of the subject.

In summary, the phenomenon of street children remains a poorly understood social problem that appears to have both historical and cross-cultural commonalities. Only recently, have these similarities been noted and scholarly investigations initiated. It is hoped that this bibliography will prove useful to those who are working on behalf of street children, allowing those programs and individuals to share and profit from each others work and experience. In addition, it is intended to serve as a resource for those clinicians and academic researchers who have begun to give this special population the serious attention that it both deserves and requires.
